The present invention relates to computing devices and more particularly to the routing of data and applications among multiple computing devices and networks. The World Wide Web (WWW) is a standardized graphical interface and gateway to information on the Internet. With the Web's standard interfaces, a user can retrieve documents, navigate from one document to another, or find related documents based on a link to a related document from a first document. Typically, the Web has a number of basic building blocks including documents, links and browsers. Many Web sites today use dynamic HTML (DHTML) to produce dynamic content web pages with content that changes automatically. The change might be automatic, such as a change in stock prices, or an automatic change in content due to a timed sequence. The change might be a change in content determined by the user's response to a timed sequence, or it might be a change in content prompted by the user's previous behavior. A typical Web site includes a server and a Web browser. The server stores information and provides the information to the Web browser. The Web browser displays the Web pages, and is the interface that allows a user to request and receive Web content from the Web site. In view of the foregoing, it would be desirable to provide an improved system and method for accessing data and information over different networks. It would also be desirable to provide an improved system and method for efficiently routing data and applications among one or more computing systems. According to one aspect of the invention, a data transfer system receives data from a first computing device over a data network. The data transfer system makes a determination as to where the data originated from and how to route the data to the second computing device over the data network. The data transfer system includes a multi-processing module
