For 1.0, use .Q: Performance impact of sleeping for a while between.tidy templates in perl? In perl, the default action after a.tidy template engine is run is to run ttidy -tmpl $_ (defined here). From that point on the program is idle (not reading input or any data). Should the program exit after doing tidy, or should it continue on reading from stdin? Is there any performance difference between the two? (I've seen arguments for both, but nothing documented.) A: The specification says: Upon successful parsing of the template stream $stderr will contain the name of the template, the name of the module containing the template, and a warning (if not the first template) stating the module that provides the template. The tmpl_source function that handles tidy files does
