A liquid crystal display (LCD) is constructed by a combination of a liquid crystal cell including a pair of substrates with a liquid crystal sealed therebetween, and a pair of polarizers disposed on the outside of the substrates. The display of an image on the LCD is achieved by changes in the orientations of the liquid crystal molecules due to the application of an electric field in the liquid crystal cell. In the fabrication of the

LCD, predetermined spacers, such as glass beads, are mixed with the liquid crystal. The spacers serve to maintain the gap between the substrates in the cell constant. The properties of liquid crystals are sensitive to moisture, ionic impurities and others. Therefore, the liquid crystal display is housed in a chamber b7e8fdf5c8
