I honestly think UR could be a neat place. Unfortunately, I don't find it to be a viable tool for my everyday workflow. It's not that I don't like it. I quite like the idea, but there is just something that just doesn't work for me. UI is very clean and the features are nice, but too many clicks and transitions can be time-consuming. You have to work through so many steps and then you end up having a lot of actions (beware to auto run all the actions).

You can do a lot with UR, but for me, it wasn't a very convenient tool. Regarding the new features in PS, I must admit I didn't think anything was too exciting. But I am very happy to see the one click fill. One click fill is awesome, even if it is only for some people. In my personal workflow, I don't need that kind of functionality because I usually always want to get a bit closer to the look I want. I do like the new Paint bucket, but this would depend on the amount of people you work with. I sincerely don't feel like I needed it because I don't want to pay a lot of attention to the details when I do a job, I just don't see the need to draw the lines or mask them. I'm not sure if this is a fact but I read it somewhere that when you work with a small team, the individual effort isn't felt as strongly as with a bigger team. So, it's common that the person with the best technical skills will be the most respected and accepted. Some people might say it's the leader. I guess it works for them, so that's what matters. The bottom line is that this is a very good and useful update for people who shoot on Fujifilm X-Trans sensors in RAW format. I have had my share of trouble with RAW from the Fujifilm GFX and GF6/7 backs, but the experience is significantly better with the X-Pro1. Performance issues aside, Lightroom 5.2 is very impressive, both in terms of functionality as well as raw processing. I have tested it on the K20D and found it to work very well. Note that the D610 and 800D are probably not among Lightroom's better performers. Some color noise is still present on the D610, for example. Excellent performance on the K20D, though. The biggest disappointment, however, is in the D800 performance. This camera does not get along with Lightroom in terms of raw processing, be it the K20D or a full-frame X-E1. I think we need a complete camera review of the D800 before this camera gets a free pass from me. If you want to go full frame, then also consider the Sony A7, which is about the same price and gets along with Lightroom just fine. But if you shoot with the D800, you should consider a future upgrade to a "proper" D4 or D800e to experience the full potential of the D800's sensor.
